• New interface: we changed from NSScroller to NSScreenEdgePanGestureRecognizer for more situations (like when you press super+space to bring up the photo list , when you bring up multitasking, etc). Ease of Use ™"Made for the iPhone, iPad, Mac." That's how Adobe spins it, anyway, and that is likely the reason why Adobe Photoshop "Made for iPad" has been a runaway success, though it's not clear whether the developer was hoping to convert iPhone/iPod touch (and Apple Pencil) owners or draw new users into the iPad product line. Actually, Apple has a different word for it---°ProMotion ,---and every iPad Pro user is a Photoshop fan. Now that I use both Lightroom 5 and Photoshop I can appreciate how the two programs have each improved significantly. Of course, Lightroom is, and has always been, better suited to the workflow of photographers. It is extremely cool how, in Lightroom 6, you can switch between your Lightroom camera and your Lightroom RAW converter. Photoshop is now more than capable of this and it's quite bizarre that the feature is not supported immediately out of the box. Hopefully, Adobe will add this feature to Adobe Camera Raw as well. Now that you can import (or import/convert) Lightroom Camera Raw files into Photoshop CS6 directly, there's no real reason to go far away from your camera to browse through the many images. One more gripe I have is that Lightroom is now using the new IR (infrared) filter. This filter suppresses chroma noise, and is an essential component of a very versatile filter set. However, I cannot for the life of me understand why Lightroom doesn't include two of the most popular filters – the Vivid (wave) filter and the High Color Effi ciency (HCE) filter. The HCE filter in particular is essential for professional image quality. And, for what I understand, the rest of Lightroom was also updated to receive the latest features of the Fujifilm X-Trans RAW plugin.
