"Rape is never a crime. It is a violent act that strips the victim of her power and her right to control her own body. As a woman and a law enforcement officer, I will always stand up for that." Seattle police Chief Kathleen O'Toole announced her resignation on Tuesday, citing differences with Mayor Jenny Durkan and a high rate of officer suicides. What the statements above mean about O'Toole's resignation is that her resignation is not in any way a reflection of the culture of the Seattle Police Department. To say that it is a reflection of a gender gap within the SPD, is to ignore the extremely qualified leadership of O'Toole. Seattle Police are second only to law enforcement agencies in the U.S. in number of officers-to-citizen. This is a demographic that has been studied, analyzed, and generally acknowledged to be hugely effective. The pay for officers of Seattle is reasonable and in my experience, higher than a great majority of other cities. In many ways, policing in Seattle is a microcosm of the larger U.S. You don't need to be a police officer, or even a U.S. citizen to see the numbers. In Seattle, there are 4 officers per 100 people. Several mathematical models have been proposed in the literature to study the relationship between brain signals. Such models are basically multivariate time series models. However, their structure and interpretation is often complex. In this work, we propose a new methodology to efficiently analyze EEG signals. First, we propose an unsupervised algorithm to automatically extract relevant components from EEG data. Then, we describe a supervised version of a temporal model that extracts associations between components. The supervised model allows to associate different components obtained from EEG signals. For that purpose, a set of stochastic difference equations is used. The model is applied to study the association between two EEG signals. To that purpose, the unsupervised method is first applied to extract an overview of the relation between the two signals. Then, the supervised model is used to more deeply analyze their relation.
