As millions of Photoshop customers share Photoshop files for review and input from stakeholders every day, the changes to social sharing have been designed to make incorporating review feedback into your designs faster and easier without ever leaving the application. All three key features of the new ecosystem for sharing, including Sharing and Commenting, Finding People, and Share for Review, provide users with a new interface to use responsive design and the web version of Lightroom Classic as a layout that is quicker and easier to use. Those features may sound promising, but I found that their implementation is incomplete. Particularly the “Share for Review” feature lacks a very important safety net, which is password-protection. If you make changes in a shared file by the community, these changes should be protected, otherwise anyone can modify the file. I believe that Lightroom Classic’s new “Share for Review” feature should also be password-protected. This would be a smart way to protect your file. Adobe’s main affirmation is that “Adobe Photoshop is the most important creative software available.” I believe that’s where the company has wanted it for a long time. Or, to use a commonism from elsewhere, Photoshop was the engine from which the rest of Adobe’s products have spun. Yes, as good as parts of this powerful program have gotten, it also is somewhat outdated and lacks some things that have been added to other software. For example, there is no application video editor, no built-in touch interface and no support for multiple monitors. The product also lacks support for most of Photoshop’s most powerful image-editing tools, including vector or 3D editing tools.
