I've just gone through the complete new experience of using PS CC on two laptops. I am very happy with the performance, but I wonder if Adobe should let users know about the potential issues right away. Normally, when you enter Full Screen mode, a pop-up window appears. In PS CC on both laptops, it doesn't appear. I had to triple-click the title bar in order to get a pop-up window. The first time I thought it was a feature and expected it to work. In the past, I always saw a pop-up window when I entered full screen. On the second laptop, the pop-up window didn't come up and I had to double-click the title bar again. I tried to enter CS6 Full Screen mode. This works fine. Then I tried the first laptop in CS7 and I got the same problem. Entering Full Screen mode is supposed to be a reliable way of getting a pop-up window, and PS should remind users about that. Lightroom 5 now utilizes the same Importing style as SmugMug. There are 5 options, allowing you to streamline your photo import in a similar fashion. You can choose from the standard SmugMug Importing method, or you can have the program automatically set the Shooting Date and Time. Currently, the import feature supports RAW photo import, but no other RAW file formats. It also does not support supporting GIF, PNG or MP3 files. Those rely on Adobe's PDF manipulation tools. You can also choose to import all images automatically, or pick and choose on an image by image basis. I like how the Importing feature offers the optional "Do Not Import" option, which is useful for ensuring you don't import a duplicate file. As mentioned previously, if you are only uploading one or two photos at a time, you can utilize the Importing feature to easily upload and edit them, then save them at the end as Favorites. Additionally, I am pleased to report that the way SmugMug Importing automatically creates unique names for images is still there. The imported files have a number in front of them, not always the one you see in a photo file name.
