This is unfortunate as it would have been more beneficial to consumers, students, and the healthcare providers. There is an over-abundance of unused medication (over-medication) and here is a better idea. Several of the approaches to rationing outlined here are being implemented. If a physician is unsure what medications the patient is currently taking (or has taken recently), then the physician may still prescribe the medication but fill the prescription at one of the nearby pharmacies. This would still be controversial but offers a solution that does not involve rationing. Physicians complain that the rationing of medications is resulting in patients being unable to afford them. Many patients have insurance and the insurance plans are not paying for the medication, so the patients are paying out of their own pocket. Patients are also losing medication because some pharmacies are refusing to fill the prescriptions. There are two ways to rationing these medications; price-based and quota-based. Price-based: Price-based rationing occurs when providers are charged a different amount for a medication based on their geographic area. This can vary by Medicare Part B, Part
