The ventricle is composed of a left and a right lateral ventricle, a fourth ventricle, and the caudal recess. The ventricle is a modified neurocranium, with the rostral components (pars intermedia and pars suprasellaris) derived from the frontonasal prominence and a caudal portion that is homologous with the braincase of a lizard and anurid amphibians. This morphology is examined with respect to its implications for organization of the brain, respiratory system, and circulatory system. The structure of the ventricular compartments, their associated foramina, and the infundibular recesses are illustrated and compared.
