From the get-go, I was impressed with the ability to quickly go retro in terms of tool design. As opposed to previous versions of Lightroom where the tools would mostly look the same, the new version feels a bit more like those in Adobe's Photoshop and Illustrator (although it does have some aspects of Photoshop that were introduced in the early 90's). If you like that look, you'll be happy with this version. Personally, I like the feel of PSE and I like the new look of Lightroom 5, so I'm not sure that I'd feel happy if I was forced to use the Photoshop-like tools Adobe Photoshop Express is still stuck in 2009. It's not a terrible program and it's more than capable of handling photos and videos. But it just hasn't evolved much since its initial release. I've got a real problem with Adobe's compression and the way they've implemented it in Photoshop Express. There are some outstanding photos in the store gallery. They're obviously good enough that someone decided to invest some time editing them. The problem is that they're "optimized" and you can't really get a good look at them without zooming in, turning off image optimization, and then doing it again. This is not what I was looking to do when I bought this iPad Pro. I wanted to see what the images were without having to Google them to get the best look. I can't think of a better example than the rather stunning "brown paper bags catching fire." If you look at it and zoom in, you'll see that there are some places where the fire in the picture is not really present. Likewise, if you go to do any image optimization, it will remove some of that contrast, making the picture look duller than it is.
