Sometimes getting a large gas bill seems like part of the curse of owning a big, fussy engine. But that's not always the case; sometimes, when you're careful and smart, a large bill can be helpful. It's possible to combine your car's gas savings with your gas bill savings to meet your fuel costs while staying within your budget. In the first phase of this, we'll look at how to reduce your gas mileage and get you closer to breaking even. In the second, we'll outline how to maximize your savings to get an even larger reduction in your fuel costs. How Can You Reduce your Mileage? When it comes to reducing your mileage, there are two basic paths. Either you can raise the economy setting of your car, while leaving everything else alone, or you can decrease the power of the car by raising the speed at which your engine spins. Since there's more than one way to accomplish each of these goals, we'll break down each approach in more detail below. Raise The Economy Setting Economy mode is a reference for how efficiently your engine is performing, and it's the easiest way to lower your mileage. If your car is equipped with a gear selection on the steering wheel, you can choose what gear you're in when you use the gas pedal. The last gear, called "economy," is the least efficient of the four settings. Switching out from economy to the next higher setting will provide you with a slight power increase at the expense of fuel efficiency. When it comes to selecting the gear you need, your car's manual should provide clear direction. It's possible that your manual will tell you which gear to use, based on your engine speed and fuel economy, and it's important to get this right. It's important to note that your mileage will decrease as your car shifts into a higher gear. You should avoid shifting into gears 1 and 2 unless the manual recommends it as a way to decrease gas mileage. Be sure that you know what the power your car offers in each of the four gears, so you can choose the right one. To lower your mileage by changing the engine speed you can decrease the
