Disney Princesas Colorear Libro. Este libro es el que buscas . Disney Princesas Colorear Libro. Disney Princesas Colorear Libro con Impresoras fáciles para..Q: Giving credit to someone else's work I have created a "book" of questions and answers for a topic (a reference book), and would like to share that work as an ebook. I have used the direct answer as the text (with an appropriate citation), but I'd like to give credit to the original author of the questions and answers. Should I be asking the original author if it is ok to share this work, or should I create a section titled 'Credits' (where an appropriate citation would be placed) and give credit to the original author? A: I would suggest that you make a legal agreement with the author. Just write something along the lines of: "I use the content from and would like to acknowledge and thank for the use of their content." and then have a lawyer draw up the agreement and send it to the original author. A: If the author agrees to it, and you come to an agreement, then you may be able to distribute a book with the author's permission. For example, M. A. Smith would be very unlikely to agree to his work being used without a payment to him. I have no idea what rights you would be considering giving away, but in this particular case you probably have a good argument for not doing that. A: I don't think it's ever appropriate to just pluck someone's work out of thin air and use it without giving them credit. If you come to an agreement with the original author and have a contract, you're in an entirely different position. You can give credit in your book as long as you do so by referencing the original site. On the other hand, if it's a community effort (which I doubt it is), a community book fair would be an entirely different situation. In that case, it's acceptable to distribute free copies of the book on the internet. Effect of a short-term hnRNP A1 RNAi on cardiac atria and sinus node functions.
